It is a great go-to resource for the passage of time as it lets you save webpages, images and emails to be recalled later. Users can access the app via the iOS device's web browser or even via their Desktop through an extension. The latter can be installed by clicking on the "More" option. In my childhood we used to eat turnips and cabbages together, and I can't remember if this was a coincidence or if we were taught to cook them together. I don't know any other kind of turnip, and I have only ever seen or been told about one kind of cabbage. The context of the question is a recipe I am thinking of using turnips, and I am wondering if I should substitute a cabbage. A: As you are looking for something to serve with your turnips, you should be mindful of the fact that most of us (myself included) dislike raw cabbage. If you want to use your cabbages, I'd replace it with cooked potato wedges, a boiled potato, even a mashed potato. That would produce a fairly mild sauce for your turnips. A: Many edible plants can be used interchangeably - including plants in the same family. Generally turnips look quite different from cabbages, although the cabbage is sometimes described as a 'giant' turnip. Your turnips had leaves, I think. For your use, although there are some recipes that specifically call for one vegetable or another, I'd use turnips or cabbage of a similar shape and size. A: I would not recommend substituting, as they have different characteristics and a lot of the flavor is derived from the whole plant and not just one organ, You may want to look at this link for some ideas: ers in Nevada in recent weeks.
